It probably had been lost by some musing rambler, whose steps had wandered along the sandy and shelly shore of the Lake Pontchartrain, bordered with rustling reeds and rushes. The lost manuscript, when found, was carefully wrapped up in a blue, silk handkerchief. The discoverer, after having opened and perused it, was astonished at not seeing, below the hist line, the signature of the author. At first, ho knew not what to do with it and was tempted to destroy it. But, having read it over again, he was more deeply impressed, and, searchingly, wondered who could have written it. He thought that it must be a representative Creole, a Franco-American, a vigorous offspring of the latin race. The more he pondered, the more he felt puzzled. I happened, myself, to be that very day an idler also, in the environs of West-End, and met with the above mentioned loiterer, who spoke to me of his discovery.
